Submission to the INSLM Review of the terrorism-related citizenship loss provisions in the Australian Citizenship Act 2007

Liberty Victoria is a peak civil liberties organisation in Australia that has worked to defend and extend human rights and freedoms in the State of Victoria since 1936. For more than eighty years we have advocated for civil liberties and human rights. These are spelled out in the United Nations' international human rights treaties, agreed to by Australia. We speak out when such rights and freedoms are threatened by governments or other organisations.

We welcome the opportunity to provide a submission to the Independent National Security Legislation Monitor (INSLM) review of the operation, effectiveness and implications of the terrorism-related citizenship loss provisions.

The Joint Councils for Civil Liberties expressed strong opposition to the Australian Citizenship Amendment (Allegiance to Australia) Bill 2015 prior to its passage.¹ Liberty Victoria continues to oppose the provisions in light of their subsequent operation. While limited public information is available about the application of the provisions, we understand that a number of individuals have had citizenship stripped under section 35 of the Australian Citizenship Act 2007 (Cth) (Citizenship Act). We express particular concern over the establishment and operation of the Citizenship Loss Board, which represents a threat to the rule of law and basic civil liberties.

In view of extensive foregoing submissions on the provisions, the present submission briefly outlines key concerns. Liberty Victoria recommends that the terrorism-related citizenship loss provisions be repealed. We note that the Canadian Parliament repealed similar provisions from Canadian law in June 2017, in response to similar concerns about the implications of stripping citizenship.

1. The citizenship loss provisions make for a second-class of citizenship and do not make Australia safer

Experts have argued that stripping citizenship does not assist Australian security, but rather risks undermining it.² The citizenship loss provisions reflect an abrogation of Australia's international responsibility as a global citizen. Australian nationals alleged to have engaged in terrorist related activities outside or inside Australia should be charged and tried in accordance with the law. By abdicating responsibility for Australian citizens involved in terrorist activities, the burden of countering terrorism is cast on other countries. Often those countries may be affected by conflict and lack the legal frameworks and capacity to effectively monitor and/or prosecute such persons. Leaving such people adrift abroad allows them to remain a security threat –to Australia, to other countries, and to Australian nationals abroad.

The provisions only apply to persons who are dual nationals. As such, the provisions operate to create two classes of citizenship. For those who hold only Australian citizenship their citizenship is inalienable; for dual nationals, it may be removed. The provisions are discriminatory and risk reinforcing the identity issues that can lead to radicalisation.³

Citizenship is also one of the most fundamental human rights, as many other entitlements flow from it. The provisions cast citizenship (at least for dual nationals) as a privilege contingent on good behaviour. The scope of offences and conduct on the basis of which citizenship may be stripped under section 35A of the Citizenship Act risks manifestly disproportionate consequences, including in relation to children. Liberty Victoria further notes the attempted expansion of the provisions proposed in the Australian Citizenship Amendment (Strengthening the Citizenship Loss Provisions) Bill 2018. We oppose the measures in that Bill, and hold deep concern that it reflects an attempted gradual erosion of the stability of citizenship.

The provisions add little of practical utility to existing counter-terrorism tools, and are not necessary as a means of preventing travel to Australia.⁴ The lack of practical rationale is highly concerning, given the risks of the scheme and the undermining of the rule of law outlined below.

In response to these same issues, in December 2017 the Canadian Parliament repealed its citizenship revocation provisions. The repeal was justified as protecting the principles of secure and equal citizenship.⁵

2. The “automatic” provisions are a legal fiction and undermine the rule of law

The consequences for individuals of being stripped of their citizenship are grave and permanent. It is essential that the legal framework governing this process under the Citizenship Act operates with these extreme consequences in mind. It demands that persons affected be afforded a fair hearing of their case to mitigate the otherwise very real risk of them being unjustly subject to these profound consequences.

Sections 33AA and 35 of the Citizenship Act provide for the ‘automatic’ loss of citizenship where a person aged 14 years or over has engaged in specified conduct. The notion that the person renounces their citizenship automatically and the Minister merely ‘notifies’ them is a pernicious legal fiction. It obfuscates the logically necessary decision-making process, and denies basic principles of due process and legal certainty on a matter affecting a person’s fundamental rights and freedoms.

The creation and operation of the Citizenship Loss Board (the Board) embodies these issues. The Board is an executive creation lacking transparency and operating in the absence of a clear legal framework. The Board’s existence undermines the notion that the citizenship loss provisions operate automatically –they evidently require a deliberative process involving complex matters of fact and law. The assertion that the Board is an ‘interdepartmental committee providing advice, not a decision-making body’⁶ is again a legal fiction –it is exercising de facto decision-making power.

The government’s secrecy as to the composition and operation of the Board is deeply concerning. The Board is making decisions of serious consequence to individuals –without an apparent legal framework, rules of evidence, procedural fairness, openness or accountability. The existence of the Board offends basic principles of administrative justice and the rule of law that are fundamental to Australian democracy. It represents a troubling expansion of executive power, eroding basic liberties to an unacceptable degree in the name of protecting them.

The High Court has held that an essential element of any legal or administrative process in Australia that adversely affects a person’s rights or interests is a real and meaningful opportunity for that person to present his or her case, be told the substance of the case to be answered and be given an opportunity of replying to it.⁷ The citizenship stripping provisions in question prohibit persons affected from being afforded procedural fairness and due process.

Persons who have their Australian citizenship stripped in these circumstances are denied access to merits review of the decision. Access to merits review is absolutely critical in ensuring that in practice persons access a fair hearing of their case, and that an unjust decision is not made. Although it may be theoretically possible for an affected person to seek judicial review of such a decision, that process would be unlikely to provide a meaningful opportunity for review given the statutory framework and nature of the process.⁸

The Minister's discretionary powers to rescind a notice and exempt a person from the provisions⁹ does not provide any meaningful safeguard, and is a troubling grant of unaccountable executive power. There is no duty on the Minister to consider exercising the power, and no natural justice attending the decision whether to consider doing so.¹⁰ The personal powers of the Minister are liable to being exercised by the Minister according to his or her personal or political whim. These decisions lack ordinary standards of transparency and accountability under the rule of law.

3. The provisions risk rendering Australians statelessness

The limiting of the provisions to dual nationals reflects Australia's international obligations not to make a person stateless. However, the application of the provisions indicates that they risk leaving Australians stateless, de jure or de facto.

Following the stripping of Neil Prakash's citizenship, relying on his purported Fijian citizenship, Fiji indicated that Prakash was not a citizen of that country.¹¹ Reports that the government did not obtain legal advice on Fijian citizenship law nor take steps to verify Prakash's citizenship status with Fijian authorities¹² raise serious concerns about the process. Minister Dutton's statement in response that neither he nor the Board made the decision to strip citizenship and the 'provisions operate automatically' reinforce the above-raised concerns about the provisions' incompatibility with the rule of law and executive accountability.

Conclusion

For the above reasons, Liberty Victoria recommends that the terrorism-related citizenship loss provisions be repealed.
